TECHNICAL NOTE

Background

The FREE Project (Football Research in an Enlarged Europe) aims to explore how people across Europe feel about football and its multiple implications, how football participates in shaping identity dynamics and perception patterns in contemporary Europe. In order to achieve this, a methodological mix was designed in the planning phase of the project.

The different methodological options were designed to provide complementary findings on the major common research questions. Emphasis was laid on the avoidance of common method bias (Podsakof et al., 2003) and the consideration of the complexity of cross-cultural and cross-national research (Klein & Kozlowski, 2000; Tsui, Nifadkar & Ou, 2007).

While the online internet survey was decided to be utilised for surveying the non-representative 'football community' across Europe, a telephone survey – for which Computer Aided Telephone Interview (CATI) was used – was targeted at representative population samples (Bishop et al., 1988; Lavrakas, 1993).

The countries included in the telephone survey were Austria, Denmark, France, Germany, Italy, Poland, Spain, Turkey, and the United Kingdom.

Part of the questions included in the questionnaire for this telephone survey were selected from the online survey mentioned above that was addressed to football fans. The questions selected were those considered more appropriate for a telephone survey taking into account the kind of contact and communication these surveys can provide. In addition, some questions were included for people who declared themselves not particularly interested in football. The questionnaire was designed in English first, and later, translated by each partner into their respective native language.

Objectives and structure of the telephone survey (CATI)

The telephone survey was designed in order to take an in-depth look at the attitudes and opinions of citizens across Europe on the following points:

- 🌐 Level of interest in football;
- 🌐 Frequency of sports and football in daily life and in daily conversation;
- 🌐 The role of football for identity construction in Europe;
- 🌐 Interest in football competitions;
- 🌐 Engagement in football-related activities;
- 🌐 Level of support for football clubs;
- 🌐 Motivations for supporting a football club;
- 🌐 Patterns of transnational support;
- 🌐 The perception of national teams;
- 🌐 Issues of football governance.

Therefore, the questionnaire was structured as follows:

1. Participant Information

- 🌐 Gender and Age;
- 🌐 Current involvement with football;
- 🌐 Country and migrant status.

2. Vision of Europe

- 🌐 Unity vs Diversity.

3. Football consumption and participation

- 🌐 Communication of football at national and European levels;
- 🌐 Men's football clubs (supporting of clubs, reasons of supporting, engagement in football-related activities);
- 🌐 Women's football clubs (supporting of clubs, reasons of supporting, engagement in football-related activities);
- 🌐 Football club support at transnational level (men and women).

4. National football teams

- 🌐 National football teams support;
- 🌐 Other national football teams supported and reasons of supporting another national teams;
- 🌐 Opinions and attitudes on the significance of national football teams.

5. Football governance

- 🌐 Trust in institutions/bodies related organization of football;
- 🌐 Opinions on the governance of football.

6. Football involvement

7. Memories of football

8. Reasons of indifference, disliking or no longer having any interest in football

Tracks and filters of the CATI questionnaire

The tracks and filters of the questionnaire, taking into account that it was addressed to a general public not necessarily interested in football, were as follows:

Method, sample and execution

The survey was conducted by phone (Computer Assisted Telephone Interview, CATI) among a sample of Europeans residing in Austria, Germany, Denmark, Spain, France, Italy, Poland, United Kingdom and Turkey. The fieldwork was conducted by BVA (France) and partners, under the direction of Céline Bracq, in December 2013. The questionnaire included a total of 39 questions (290 variables).

The final sample was composed of 7 245 Europeans representative of the population aged 15 or more. The representativity of the sample was guaranteed by the use of the quota method applied to gender and age. Depending on the country, additional variables (occupation, income, degree, region, size of the agglomeration) were added. For a sample size of 800 interviews per country, the sampling error in each country was ± 3.4 (95% confidence interval).

As in every quantitative study, this one presents results which are subject to the margins of error inherent to statistical laws. The table here below presents these margin of errors based on the result obtained and the size of the sample taken into account.

Table 1: Margins of error depending on the size of the subsamples

Sample size	Interval confidence of 95% according to the score

Weighting

Due to the differences of the sizes of the countries the total data provided in this report have been weighted taking into account the population (over 15 years) in each of them as shows table 2. This statistical procedure adjusts the weight of each country in the overall scores depending upon its actual population and thus allows to have meaningful ‘European’ aggregate scores.

Table 2: Sample size and population over 15 of the countries included

Country	Sample before weighting	Population over 15	Percent	Weight factor	Sample after weighting
Austria	812	7 243 244	2.0	0.175	140
Denmark	802	4 627 771	1.3	0.114	91
